What do you think? What means homeland for you? Describe by yourself by adding your own perspectives. Use the moderation cards and write down your results.
Homeland(s)

Homeland is different for people. If you think about your homeland, you have your own definition. Often homeland is described as a special place, e.g. where you grew up. It could be related to persons you love, like you family or friends. Sometimes it has to do with special traditions, with religion. Things you know from your childhood can give you a feeling of your homeland, like a special accent or a dialect, a smell, a taste, a melody. Homeland is not precise. It can be a feeling of comfort, safety, security, membership or (having) orientation – which is not connected to a special place but can develop in different places.

We want to know your perspectives. What makes your homeland special for you? What would you miss if you had to leave your homeland? Coming to another country, what would you need to make a new homeland? What does your homeland feel like, sound like, smell like?

Task

Choose one strong perspective with your group as written here or found in the task before. Think about the perspective – what is connected with it? How does it feel? Why is it strong? Which emotions and feelings do you have about it? How does it sound like? Write down your ideas in a mind-map.

Be creative and look out for a bunch of different ideas.
